1. Introduction

a. Disclaimer

The authors thank Clyde Farrell for his continued investment into the legal community by way of providing a sample third party special needs trust attached to this article in Appendix A. We, the authors of this paper, believe that the provision of this sample trust is important for illustrative purposes for developing a focused, yet contextual understanding of the essential terms and provisions of a properly drafted third party special needs trust intended for approval and operation under the laws of Texas and state and regional special needs trust interpretation by governmental agencies—namely the Social Security Administration (SSA) and the Texas Health and Human Services (THHS). That being said, the trust included in Appendix A is not being offered or warranted by the authors or Clyde Farrell as specific legal advice for use in a particular client’s matter. As you will see in our discussion throughout this article, a third-party special needs trust is a tailored tool for the well-being of the intended beneficiary and not simply a form.

b. Third-Party Special Needs Trusts are Not a Forms Practice

As special needs trust practitioners, you often connect with clients and their concern for themselves¹ or their child, parent, sibling or other loved one. You are confronted with the realities of their lives, social networks, finances, physical and mental capabilities. According to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), up to 1 in 4 adults in the United States have some form of disability.² The CDC further reports that one in six children aged 3 through 17 years have one or more developmental disabilities.³ Though a statistically significant portion of the American population has suffered and will suffer from some form of disability, those disabilities may be temporary, relapsing, remitting, permanent, partially disabling, physical, mental, or physical and mental, presenting with different signs and symptoms at different times. At the core of every special needs plan, then, is the beneficiary’s⁴ ability to either provide for their own care or have care be provided for them in the hopes to maximize the beneficiary’s quality of life.

Amidst the issue of actual or possible disability, you have the intended beneficiary who has lived or may live all or a portion of their lives with a disability—having their own hopes, dreams, families, social networks, and means. Taking the approach that a third-party special needs trust is a form disregards a primary focus of all special needs trusts – the person. Therefore, it is the authors’ position that a special needs trust necessarily requires person centered planning (“PCP”). A PCP “...approach identifies the person’s strengths, goals, medical needs, needs for home- and community-based services, and desired outcomes. The approach also identifies the person’s preferences in areas such as recreation, transportation, friendships, therapies and treatments, housing, vocational training and employment, family relationships, and social activities. Unique factors such as culture and language also are addressed.”⁵

⁴ Throughout this paper, the term “beneficiary” will be used to refer to the beneficiary of a special needs trust.

As discussed later, another consideration of special needs planning is whether such needs can or should be met by public benefits. It is possible that a beneficiary’s needs may be better met by a reduction in benefits or temporary or ongoing ineligibility for benefits. Therefore, drafting with flexibility in mind is core to navigating the needs of the beneficiary.

2. History of Third-Party Special Needs Trusts

Special Needs Trusts (SNTs) are tools used to maximize an individual’s eligibility for public benefits programs like Supplemental Security Income (SSI) and Medicaid by placing assets and/or income into a trust that is treated as exempt resource or asset that is not counted—most often we are concerned about Medicaid and SSI eligibility. Due to perceived abuses by families attempting to work around the strictures of income and asset rules, Congress passed the Omnibus Budget
